No. Scratch that. I've made a hundred mistakes. Writing the letter. Leaving it with Fitz. Going to New York. Take your pick. My life is the Russian roulette of bad decisions, except in this game, every chamber is loaded.

"It's every bad thought you've ever had about yourself." The quiet pain laced through his words shoots me straight through the heart. "It's a boulder sitting on your chest, squeezing the air from your lungs. It's the feeling of losing something. It's tearing your house apart brick by brick to find it, even though you know it's not there."

Whoa.

"I have to make a call. It's an emergency." My heart slams against my ribs, desperate to break free and escape the inevitable pain.

He checks the time on his phone. "Hope it can wait an hour."

"Not really."

"Relax, kid. You want to hear a story?"

"Sure. Yes. Please distract me. Anything."

He settles in his seat. "I met Makayla on my twenty-second birthday ..."

I groan silently and clutch my phone in my hands.

This trip was a mistake that's going to tear Fitz and me apart. I can feel it. There's no coming back from this.

Fitz Wilding wears confidence like a crown. He's quick with a lazy grin, comfortable in every situation, and so adaptable it makes my head spin. He's everything I'm not, and I hate him for it. Of course, I don't hate him enough. Not nearly. If my hate were born of actual resentment and not of heartbreak, I'd be immune to the fact that he looks so heartstoppingly good all the time. Take baseball, for example. Fitz looks real good at third: knees bent in a crouch, blue eyes serious, glove ready, brown hair curling under the edge of his hat.

Fitz watching a movie is equally phenomenal, because every emotion plays out on his face. I've probably spent entire days of my life watching Fitz watch movies. The
